Search Continues For Joanna Rogers

A two-day search for a missing Lubbock teenager ends with no new leads. More than 500 volunteers searched Lubbock County for 16-year-old Joanna Rogers.

The United Response Search and Rescue Team has returned to Dallas. Though they organized this weekend's search with the hope of finding something tied to Joanna, they're not disappointed. In fact, this is the largest volunteer search team they have ever assembled. If more leads come in that link Joanna to a particular area, United Search and Response is ready to come back and recall its 500 volunteers.

Searchers combed fields, wooded areas and remote locations throughout the county Saturday and Sunday. They even took their search into the air.

Authorities say they still haven't ruled out the possibility that Joanna disappeared on her own. But then again, authorities say no scenarios or suspects have been ruled in or out.

"We have some that we still have some information on that we want to obtain from them," says Lieutenant Cody Scott, with the Lubbock County Sheriff's Office. "We have talked to some people more extensively than we have others. To say we've developed a suspect, I can't go that far because ... we're still not positive what has happened with Joanna."

Three weeks into this investigation, there is the fear that leads will stop coming in. So authorities are quickly following up on every lead that comes in.
